This can be: NEW DELHI: The Narendra Modi government will soon come out with a new policy on higher education, which would drastically scale back the subsidy it gives to students, making it the most severe move yet to tackle India's surging student loan burden. While the government has opened itself to more foreign universities, it has now made it clear that it is considering what is being dubbed as a massive cut in financial aid to students and faculty that will have a major impact on India's student-loan sector. The move is a crucial part of the government's plan to deal with the mounting loan burden, which has seen outstanding debt pile up to $46 billion, or more than half of the country's total GDP. The university sector was also set to suffer with the government cancelling or delaying plans to build 25 campuses across the country. In a likely move to stem losses, it would also start a process to upgrade and make the country's huge network of small, state-run universities more merit-driven. "If there is a discussion on higher education, the government will consider scaling down financial support to students and faculty," a senior government official said, in an indication that the government may only have been considering a cut but could back off to avoid losses. A major change in the scheme will be giving loans with lower interest rates to qualifying students, an official said, in an indication that the government is looking at the option of reducing subsidies to students altogether. This would make an impact on all students, including the more than 60 million who have outstanding loans and whose monthly repayments make up more than half of their incomes. At present, as many as 18% of undergraduate and 25% of graduate students in 82157476af
